Keane Strangeland 2012.rar.rarQ: Can we use Sample mean to calculate accuracy rate? I have a dataset with 2 classes or labels. Using classification model. I am getting a prediction on some test data. Now, I am calculating accuracy as : The cross entropy is equal to: $1 - \text{accuracy} = 2^{\log(y/p)}$ where y is the number of correctly predicted objects, and p is the number of predicted objects. Is the formula fine? If its wrong, can we calculate accuracy rate using the following formula : Mean of the mean of the labels? A: Yes, the formula you have is correct. If you use it, you need to fix your precision too. In your case your measure of performance is exactly $2^{\log(y/p)}$ but of course y and p are not available to use as internal parameter, because you lost the information. Next year's climate summit will be the first major event since Trump's administration announced the U.S. would withdraw from the Paris Climate Agreement. However, as the first Republican president to do so, he has not completely laid to waste the consensus-building momentum of the last two decades. Among American states that have enacted the Clean Power Plan - the federal regulatory standard to reduce carbon emissions by 30 percent by 2030 - no party line is as stark as the divide between Democratic and Republican states. Of the 45 states that have not already implemented the Clean Power Plan, 39 are led by Republican governors and 29 by Democratic governors. The issue is sensitive for state leaders and, particularly, Republican state lawmakers who wish to prevent the federal government from imposing burdensome regulations on the power sector. This is one element of the ideological split: Republicans tend to view climate change as a problem, and yet they tend to oppose any regulation to address it. On the other hand, Democratic state leaders and their constituents tend to see climate change as
