For example, a dispatch may be planned and executed based upon a person's history of health conditions, any identified conditions on the person or the person's family members, the treatment history for that person, the past reaction of any medication that person may have taken, and any other relevant information about that person or that person's family members. PS-scheduling techniques may be considered by some as a form of Patient-Specific Care (PS-Care). PS-scheduling may be further distinguished from procedural scheduling in that it may permit schedule changes based on an individual's history. PS-scheduling may also be distinguished from population-wide scheduling in that PS-scheduling may be done on an individual basis, rather than on a population level. In PS-scheduling, a dispatch-in-advance plan typically specifies various time windows for each individual or group of individuals. One or more results are then sent, either to the individuals, or to a central dispatcher. The central dispatcher is then responsible for dispatching medical professionals to the appropriate individuals or groups of individuals at the appropriate times
