Microbubble enhancement of ultrasound-mediated prostate cancer cell killing under flow conditions: implications for ultrasound-enhanced drug delivery. Using the combination of microbubble-mediated acoustic cavitation and ultrasound-mediated cell killing under flow conditions, we systematically examined various key physical and biological aspects of the acoustic cavitation-mediated cell killing. It has been shown that transient cavitation can enhance ultrasound-mediated cell killing under flow conditions. However, whether such microbubble-mediated acoustic cavitation could enhance ultrasound-mediated cell killing under more physiologically relevant conditions remains unclear. Therefore, the goal of this study was to examine the enhancement of ultrasound-mediated cell killing by transient cavitation, under flow conditions at physiologically relevant temperatures and under more clinically relevant blood perfusion rates. We systematically examined the effects of varying the microbubble concentration and ultrasound frequency. We demonstrated that at a very low microbubble concentration (1/8 vol %), transient cavitation-enhanced ultrasound-mediated cell killing under flow conditions could be observed. In particular, transient cavitation provided the acoustic cavitation threshold required to establish cavitation nuclei, and above this threshold, a linear increase in the rate of cell killing was observed as the concentration of injected microbubbles increased. The level of the transient cavitation-enhanced cell killing was elevated under less stringent experimental conditions (37 degrees C instead of physiological temperature) and under c9d1549cdd
