This story was originally published by Grist and appears here as part of the Climate Desk collaboration. Donald Trump has appeared to react to Michael Cohen's testimony before Congress by denying that he had committed any crimes and attacking Cohen as a "rat" and a "con man." The Republican presidential nominee on Thursday also reportedly called Cohen a "weak person" who is "lying and trying to get a reduced sentence." But evidence shows Cohen may have more than repaid his mentor, President Trump, for some of the early loyalty he was willing to show his employer. Among the many criminal cases Cohen has pleaded guilty to in federal court as part of a deal with federal prosecutors to cooperate with the probe into the Trump administration, there is one example of his alleged help with a real estate deal that was sealed by Trump's family—the Trump Tower Moscow deal. In public filings and testimony before Congress, Cohen has indicated he played a key role in devising a plan to pay Russian President Vladimir Putin to keep the Trump Organization's 2016 presidential bid "above-board" from Putin's eyes and from the FBI's. The deal to form a joint partnership with Russia to build the Trump Tower Moscow deal appeared to have been carried out much as Cohen and Trump had originally outlined it. In a statement last July, Cohen announced that the Trump Organization, its relatives, and his own money would be providing financing for a deal in Moscow with a lucrative shopping center, to be financed using local developers from Russia. The developers would include a company formed by a close friend of Putin's, Gennady Timchenko, whose assets were frozen by the United States in 2014. Prosecutors in New York allege in a separate case that Timchenko made his money as part of Russia's financial intervention into the west, with ties to organized crime. Cohen has said he discussed the development with Putin, who was to benefit from it. "There has never been a proposal made to me nor to the Trump Organization by Mr. Putin or his regime," Cohen said last year. "Furthermore, during the campaign for President, I never heard Donald Trump discuss business dealings in Russia, or speak about Russia at all.
