Kamala Harris (D-CA) touted her democratic socialist "Medicare for All" plan at a campaign event in Iowa this week as well as in her closing remarks at the Democratic debate on Wednesday. But at the debate, it was not for a moment a topic mentioned by Joe Biden, Warren, or Sanders, the top three contenders for the nomination. Harris's remarks at the debate illustrated that she has an entirely different policy agenda than Sanders and Warren, who have campaigned in recent days on Medicare for All proposals. "We must stand up to the insurance industry, to the drug companies, and to the fossil fuel industry and their attacks on our health care," said Harris, before saying the following: Advertisement: "I would make public the Medicare for All plan that I helped to create. It covers all Americans with a plan that no one can afford to say no to. I think it will be very compelling for America, and I think it will win and I'm really glad we are having this conversation. I've got Medicare for All, it's called Medicare for America." "Medicare for All," of course, is the term used to describe the Sanders and Warren's health care proposals. Medicare for All means that every American would get government-run health insurance. According to the two candidates, it would also eliminate private health insurance companies
